Men’s Health – Derek Griffith, Ph.D.

Derek Griffith, Ph.D., is a leading social scientist focused on social influences on men’s health and men’s health disparities. Trained in clinical/community psychology and public health, Dr. Griffith primarily focuses on identifying and addressing psycho-social, cultural, and environmental impacts on African American men’s health and well-being.

He specializes in the role that gender plays in motivating men to engage in healthy life style practices throughout their lifetime, and how this may be shaped by race, ethnicity, and other factors. He also studies how men’s priorities, goals and values affect their physical and mental health. His research on African American men’s health and men’s health disparities has been funded by several institutes within the National Institutes of Health and Foundations such as the American Cancer Society, Aetna Foundation, and W.K. Kellogg Foundation. His research has been featured in such news outlets as MSN, NPR, Time Magazine, U.S. News & World Report, and USA Today. Dr. Griffith is the Founding Director of the Center for Research on Men’s Health also at Vanderbilt University, which is one of the nation’s first university-wide centers focused on biological, psychological, and social factors that affect men’s health. In a pioneering way, his research on men’s health examines all of these factors to form a more holistic picture that benefits men, families, healthcare providers, and policymakers. Dr. Griffith believes that men’s health outcomes are more than the sum of biology and behavior. Dr. Griffith is an Associate Professor of Medicine in the Health and Society Department at Vanderbilt University. Although he has particular expertise in the health of African American men, he also does research on other men in the U.S. and across the globe. If you’re reading this, be encouraged and commit today to take care of your health.
